

Legislative Bulletin

May 12, 2023 | nclm.org

The Weekly Recap

WHAT HAPPENED: It was, by comparison, a much quieter week at the General Assembly, following the previous week's "crossover" deadline clamor that determined what bills would remain eligible this session. (Much of the public dialogue meanwhile centered on the abortion limitation bill that the chambers during crossover week sent Gov. Roy Cooper. He opposes the legislation and hopes lawmakers will sustain his expected veto amid a Republican supermajority that could override it). But, importantly right now for cities and towns, we're essentially at the midpoint of the 2023 session, and it's time to review.

WHAT IT MEANS: Look below in this Bulletin for where key legislation stands at this point. In short, the representatives of member cities and towns should feel encouraged about their efforts and communication with General Assembly members but should also remain engaged as plenty of work remains in the 2023 session. On that note...

ON TAP: A new edition of Advancing Advocacy is scheduled for Wednesday, May 17. This NCLM-led webinar will provide updates on key bills and inform you, our local leaders, on how to respond on several issues. Register now.

THE SKINNY: There may still be months to go before the General Assembly adjourns for the year; there's no overall deadline. With a new fiscal year on the horizon, the Senate's budget draft is expected before long, and there may be other issues, like redistricting, that lawmakers take up before it's over. Along the way, we're keeping this weekly Bulletin focused on the legislative interests of cities and towns. Read on for important updates.

Midpoint Legislative Update

In case you missed it on Thursday, what follows is a synopsis of an update from NCLM Director of Government Affairs Erin Wynia regarding where key legislation stands following the passing of the legislative crossover deadline on May 4.

In short, the representatives of member cities and towns should feel encouraged about their efforts, including on SB 317/HB 562 Addressing the Workforce Housing Crisis, which failed to move ahead of the crossover deadline. That the state budget plan approved by the House continues to heavily invest in infrastructure is another positive for municipalities.

Still, there are months to go in this legislative session. Our team has flagged a few pieces of legislation that appear likely to move ahead and need your advocacy to ensure a good result for cities. Now is the time to focus.

Here are three key pieces of legislation that require communication with legislators and action. We've included links to talking points documents that will assist you in those communications:

- HB 409 Regulation of Accessory Dwelling Units would preempt local zoning in every community statewide by allowing a second residence to be built on any lot zoned for single-family homes, with very few restrictions. Having passed the House, it is now poised for passage in the Senate without your efforts to inform senators about how it would change neighborhoods all across your city. A fact sheet with talking points can be found here.
- SB 675 Land Use Changes and Clarifications would eliminate all extra-territorial jurisdiction (ETJ) in the state, damaging the ability to ensure that compatible growth takes place and even slowing development in some areas. Draw upon these talking points and point to specific concerns in your town in your conversations with legislators.
- HB 140 Civilian Traffic Investigators/Pilot would allow select cities to use civilian traffic investigators to respond to traffic accidents, a change that would allow them to more effectively use sworn officers to deter and respond to crime and address critical labor shortages in public safety. Unfortunately, the legislation was amended to apply to only four cities after earlier applying statewide. Let your legislators know the importance of this bill's passage but also why it should be changed to apply statewide. These talking points give you more background.

As we've already seen this legislative session, the voices of city officials change outcomes. And with your continued conversations in the coming weeks, more positive results will come. You can find a full rundown of significant legislation affecting cities and towns here. Also, please let Erin, at ewynia@nclm.org, or any of our Government Affairs staff members, know how your discussions with legislators go. Your feedback helps us do better, too.

NCLM Intervenes in Lighting Rate Case

The League of Municipalities moved to minimize a proposed Duke Energy Progress municipal lighting rate increase this week by presenting a counteroffer during rate case negotiations. The League intervened in the case in March on behalf of cities in the Duke Energy Progress territory, which covers electrical services to a significant portion of eastern North Carolina as well as some areas in western North Carolina. The utility's proposed increase would include a three-year multi-rate plan to raise the rates for lighting class customers by slightly more than 30 percent. Duke Energy Progress stated that this increase was necessary to cover the costs of infrastructure improvements, grid modernization, and clean energy initiatives. The North Carolina Utilities Commission is currently hearing testimony about the proposal and will decide on rate increases in the upcoming months.

During a Utilities Commission hearing this week, the League actively participated by presenting testimony from mayors Bill Saffo of Wilmington and Terry Mann of Whiteville. Additionally, the League's counsel cross-examined several Duke Energy Progress witnesses and continues to negotiate on behalf of cities to safeguard their budgets and enable them to continue providing essential services to citizens. It is likely that any rate increases approved by the Utilities Commission in this case will carry over to expected future increases for municipal customers in the utility's other division, Duke Energy Carolinas, which covers most of the remainder of the state.
